Lowndes

Cohabitation Agreements

What if we live together but aren't married?

Florida does not recognize common-law marriage, so couples who live together without marrying generally don't have the rights spouses have, including alimony or equitable distribution of property. A cohabitation agreement lets you decide in advance how property, finances, and shared expenses will be handled during the relationship and divided if it ends. Planning ahead can make a breakup far less costly and contentious, and we guide our clients through the process with strength and compassion.

Our firm also has experienced attorneys who can assist with business agreements, powers of attorney, health care directives, and wills.

For agreements made before or during marriage, learn more about our prenuptial and postnuptial agreement services.

Contact

For questions about your family law matter, contact our Family & Marital Law team.

Key Contacts

Terry C. Young

Derren K. Ciaglia

Crystal E. Buit

Related Professionals

Terry C. Young

Derren K. Ciaglia

Crystal E. Buit

Haley C. Davis

Sean Klein

Chelsea A. Miller

Bradley W. Rossway

Krista Runte

Related Expertise

Alimony & Spousal Support

Collaborative Divorce

Complex & High Net-Worth Divorce

Divorce

Family & Marital Law

Parenting Plans, Timesharing & Child Support

Paternity & Unmarried Parents

Post-Divorce Modifications & Enforcement

Prenuptial & Postnuptial Agreements

Property Division & Equitable Distribution