Alex Dobrev is highlighted in this GrowthSpotter article about the Distressed Condominium Relief Act expiration and what this could mean for the real estate market. As the vice-chair of the Condominium & Planned Development Committee of The Florida Bar and real estate shareholder at the firm, Dobrev questions whether this should expire at all. "There has been a battle between different interest groups," he said. "Those who oppose the law feel like somebody needs to be responsible and on the hook at all times ... but I think the vast majority of people would absolutely agree that the DCRA has been a good thing that has really made it possible for these condo projects to survive."
